CRIB-O-GRAM FOR EARLY DETECTION

Stanford University Hospital is using a crib-o-gram to screen newborn infants for deafness.

Developed by Dr. F. Blair Simmons, the device uses an inexpensive motion detector mounted on the crib frame. Motion before, during and after a test sound is emitted from a microphone in the ceiling of the nursery is picked up by the device.

Most accurate during periods of light sleep, the device requires little staff time to use it and costs approximately 85¢ per child.

Over the past three years, 180,000 tests have been administered to 6,000 babies in the hospital's nursery. A total of 327 babies failed the test, and their parents were asked to return them at six months for further screening. Eight of those infants were found to have a hearing loss.
